Where do I start with Dragon Ball? There's just so much to talk about. The lovable characters, recognizable artwork, life lessons, and some of my best memories growing up.

I started watching Dragon Ball at the age of 3, in 1997, so I'm a part of the first wave of American fans. As a kid I was amazed by the feats these characters could pull off, but as I got older, I noticed details in the show that spoke to me, and that I didn't understand the first time around. This series is much more than a simple fighting anime, and it saddens me when fans who enjoyed the show as children don't take the time to appreciate it as adults with a more mature perspective.

My love for Son Goku and his friends has remained strong since I first became a fan. I've spent years playing Dragon Ball Z games and collecting the figures, and I can't count how many times I've gone through the manga and anime. This love for the series motivated me to create a Facebook fan page in 2011, which I named "Kakarot."¹ It's a dedication to Son Goku, and a platform that enables me to speak to other Dragon Ball fans.

It grew fast. On Valentine's day of 2012 it gained over 35,000 likes after an image went viral. Once I saw the crowd I had, I decided it was time to talk about the life lessons I learned from the show. I often post about how Goku and Krillin taught me the meaning of an unconditional friendship, and that I should never throw in the towel if something is important to me. I also love talking about the theme of redemption, such as the relationship between Gohan and Piccolo. Although I must confess I do throw in a lot of crude Dragon Ball humor as well as the occasional pun for a good laugh. King Kai would be proud.

The fans enjoy those posts, and every day I receive messages telling me one of the posts cheered them up, talked them out of doing something stupid, or just made them want to rewatch the anime. Dragon Ball has effected my life and those I've met while running this page over the last 3 years.

Even now at the age of 21, I still look up to Son Goku just like I did when I was a little boy. ☺
